Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: .I found him, pale, horribly pale, entirely like the Jacques of my dream. My first thought was to throw myself upon him, to take him in my arms, and carry him to the bed, no matter where, but to take him away from there, my God, to take him away from there. Then suddenly, I reflected: You cannot, he is too tall for you to lift! And then, seeing that my Mother Jacques remained stretched out in that place, where the dream had told me he was to die, my courage left me; the mask of constrained cheerfulness we put on our faces to reassure the dying, would no longer hold in place, and I fell on my knees by the sofa, shedding a torrent of tears. Jacques turned painfully toward me. It s you, Daniel--You have met the doctor, have n t you? I begged that...
