Sir Charles, I remember, as the doctor read, mentions getting leave for his Beauchamp to come over, who, he says, will supply his absence to him--But, ah, Lucy! Who, let me have the boldness to ask, shall supply it to your Harriet--Time, my dear, will do nothing for me, except I could hear something very much amiss of this man. I have a great suspicion, that the first part of the letter enclosed related to me. The doctor looked so earnestly at me, when he skipt two sides of it; and, as I thought, with so much compassion!--To be sure, it was about me. What would I give to know as much of his mind as Dr. Bartlett knows! If I thought he pitied the poor Harriet--I should scorn myself. I am, I will be, above his pity, Lucy. In this believe your Harriet Byron....
